SYNOPSIS -- CHAPTER NINE
"Into Segundo's Hands" ✓

When the hotel detective and a copy come onto the scene, Segundo makes a getaway. One of his henchman is arrested and all go to Maybelle's room for inquiry. Doris tells that Segundo has been trying to take revenge on her and her father because her father wouldn't do as Segundo wanted. The arrested henchman knows nothing and cannot tell who Segundo's friends are or where he is likely to hang out. Maybelle is asked just what she knows of Arriola Segundo, and she says, "Why, I don't know anything. Only I met him in Florida and he seemed such a nice man." Maybelle is very nervous. In the midst of the proceedings Maybelle's mother arrives from Carbon City, wanting to know what her daughter is doing in New York. Everyone leaves and Mrs. Pratt asks Rutger to stay, demanding to know the meaning of all the newspaper clippings she has of pictures of these two together. Maybelle goes about explaining, and the scene changes to--

The Sutton house, where Segundo has stolen in and placed, among other papers on Sutton's desk, a faked telegram. Jack and Doris return home and Jack tells Doris that quarreling with her makes him very unhappy-- and a darned poor ball player. And now he's in trouble for playing under an assumed name. He's going to go to his dad and inform him that in the future he'll use his own name-- it's his. Doris advises him not to quarrel with his father. Jack, in appreciation of her interest-- and other things-- kisses her. She quickly turns away and he thinks he has hurt her feelings, but she is only smiling, and when he discovers this he is about to hug her when her father comes back from Washington with the good news that the international loan details were concluded and one of his most cherished ambitions is about to become a fact. He is very happy until he finds the fake telegram reading:

The Ambassador has wired me from Washington of new developments since your departure. Unless you wish to have your entire cherished island proposition fall through it is imperative you see me at once. Will be aboard S.S. Malay Straits which sails 10 o'clock tonight Pier 90 North River.
